

Social Media and the Workplace

Social media—encompassing web-based and mobile interactive technologies, including blogs, photo sharing, forums, and social networking, using platforms such as Facebook, X (formerly Twitter), LinkedIn, and YouTube—is easily available, constantly evolving, and increasingly pervasive. It is a tool for business and a means of personal social interaction.

Epstein Becker Green's attorneys offer a full range of legal services to help clients minimize the risks presented by a digital workplace while maximizing its advantages and opportunities.

These services include:

- Counseling clients on workplace concerns and best practices relating to:
 - Social media harassment and discrimination
 - Facebook "friending" and online relationships between management and subordinates
 - Advertising claims made online about company products and services, as well as liability under the Federal Trade Commission's Endorsement Guidelines
 - The protection of trade secrets and other proprietary and confidential data online
 - Employee privacy rights concerning, among other things, communications and information sent or stored in the company's electronic information systems
 - Online union organizing and protected concerted activity
 - Wage and hour issues, such as non-exempt employees' participation in company blogs or social media sites on and off the clock
